Overview

1

The amount of potential spending available per person in any conceivable trade area which might be drawn in Australia is information that is important for a wide variety of businesses, ranging from property owners and retailers to local governments, financial institutions and marketers of all products. The Pitney Bowes Business Insight Consumer Spending Potential (CSP) data set allows users to work up the household market for any or all of 107 categories and sub-categories of consumption for any part or all of Australia.

This 2009 version of the CSP has updated the previous spending estimates accounting for growth in expenditure and growth in population. One of the key features of the CSP is that each new version is designed to be linked to the prior release. This ensures you of continuity and the integrity of spend potential from one year to the next.

The CSP provides estimates of average per capita household spending for each of the over 38,500 Census Collector Districts (CD) in Australia. A CD is a region that is comprised of about 200 households and is the smallest geography for which the Australian Bureau of Statistics currently provides information. Using this building block in conjunction with the demographic information in AnySite enables the operator to calculate the amount of potential spend originating in any designated area as well as the corresponding characteristics of the people who make up that market.

Whether your interest is the spend differential between ice cream and chocolate, or the wallet share for home mortgages, Pitney Bowes Business Insight CSP will give you the analytical fidelity you need to visualise the bottom line of your potential market.

Transparent, Robust Model

Unlike other products on the market, the CSP has been put together on a 'top-down' basis. That is, we start with the overall market, and then appropriately apportion that total amount to each CD by category. The size of the overall potential spending market is limited only by the amount of income available. Utilising a cash flow analysis of the National Accounts, the GDP figures put together by the Bureau of Statistics, we have calculated the total amount of income available to households by each state/territory. Additionally, we are able to construct a measure of how much of this income is saved and not spent. Subtracting total savings from total income gives us the amount of money that is available for spending by households.

From this state/territory benchmark, we apportion these available funds down to the postcode level using income tax data from the Australian Taxation Office and demographic data from the Census. Dividing up this spending into the proper categories is done using the relativities from the Household Expenditure Survey, a study that is undertaken every five years by the Bureau of Statistics to provide the weightings for the Consumer Price Index (the measure of inflation). The results from this Survey tell us, for each income quintile within each state/territory, the proportion of spending that goes to food, alcohol, household services and recreation, to name but four of 13 broad categories.

From these postcode benchmarks, we utilise standard regressions and neural networks to calculate the spending for each CD. The underlying data to accomplish this task comes from the latest Census and employs about two dozen different variables. The socio-economic data we use in this process includes: Level of education, percentage of households with a mortgage, the number of couple families with dependent children, the ratio of senior citizens to young children, the ratio of mortgage payments to income, the number of lone person households and the birthplace of residents. It should be noted, however, that not every variable is used for each category of spending.

Scope of Categories

The Household Expenditure Survey ultimately breaks out household spending into over 600 categories, sub-categories and detailed sub-categories. The CSP's 107 categories and sub-categories were chosen primarily because they represent the key elements of household spending but also because the underlying data from the Survey has relatively low standard errors. Should users require more detail than is provided in the CSP's data set, Pitney Bowes Business Insight can calculate a per capita average spend per CCD for over 200 more detailed sub-categories. This extra data is shown in the section following with an asterisk (*) next to the detailed sub-category item.

The sub-category Fruit and Nuts, for example, can be further broken down into its components, such as stone fruit, berries, apples and pears, melons, bananas, dried grapes, nuts, etc. Equally, the sub-category Vehicle Charges can be further disaggregated into crash repairs, servicing, payments for driver's licenses and parking fees. Other detailed sub-categories covering diverse sectors such as curtains and blinds, musical instruments, boat purchase, animal minding charges and legal fees, however, cannot be calculated due to their extremely high standard errors.

The estimate of the household spending market for each state and territory for each broad category is benchmarked to data from several reports from the Bureau of Statistics. Once any necessary adjustments have been made to this postcode benchmark, the CSP then uses the relativities from the Household Expenditure Survey to break down further each of the broad categories into their respective sub-categories. These postcode estimates of spending potential are then turned into an average per capita spend for each of the CDs within that postcode by using additional demographic data from the Census.

Sub-categories components

In addition to the categories and sub-categories of the CSP, we have itemised the components of each sub-category. This listing corresponds to the details as published in the Household Expenditure Survey and thus follows the nomenclature of that publication. For example, specialist sports shoes are included under Recreation and not Footwear.

An asterisk (*) next to the detailed item signifies that this good or service has a low enough standard error for Pitney Bowes Business Insight to be able, on request, to calculate an average per capita spend per CD.

Note: Abbreviation 'nfd' stands for 'not further defined', while 'nec' stands for 'not elsewhere classified'. These abbreviations have been used in the table below because the detailed list of sub category items reflects the exact structure of the Household Expenditure Survey.
